

Amber massage

Amber is a unique stone. Well, actually it is not a stone at all, rather an amorphous, fossil tree resin. Treatment with amber has its own rules. It used to be swallowed, purified amber oil was used, and amber rosaries were very popular as well. It is known that Martin Luther carried a piece of amber against formation of kidney stones. But most often amber was worn around the neck.

Amber massage is a type of lithotherapy with all the healing properties amber possesses, and amber has much more distinct healing properties than most of the stones.

Prior to the amber therapy session essential oils will be applied to your body thus allowing you to relax before the treatment starts, and only then pieces of amber and a bag of amber beads will be used. Pieces of amber of various sizes are heated and then put on the active points of your body. Parts of the body free from amber are massaged. It starts with a regular massage, followed by intermittent massage with bags of amber beads and with pieces of amber heated to the temperature of 40-45 degrees Celsius. The heat coming from these pieces of amber can penetrate up to a depth of 4cm. During amber therapy blood circulation improves in the vicinity of the point of your body affected by an illness, the cells start to function more actively, while blood and lymph drains toxins and wastes. Moreover, amber transfers its energy to the body of the patient using free electrons. At the same time tissue is enriched with oxygen.

Amber therapy is most efficient for relieving stress, depression, overall body relaxation and, what is most important, it is a strong toning agent. The human body has particularly sensitive areas and biologically active points. When applying amber to these points, it is possible to treat different illnesses, including the ones related to disturbances of the nervous system.
